Make your first big step a good one. With Ryder training.

Some people weren't cut out to be cooped up.

Maybe you're one of them. You want to climb the Big Rig Ladder. And Ryder Technical is where you start your climb.

By the time you've completed your training course, you will know what it is like to swing up into a big rig cab like this one. Show it who's boss. Make those 855 cubic inches of raw diesel power behave, with a lot of gears to tame them.

Your Ryder Tech course begins with home study lessons, learning the rules of the road, safety regulations for different types of cargo, drive trains, transmissions, braking systems.

Then you move on to the real thing at a Ryder Training Center. We put you through three tough weeks of driver training, on the driving range and on the road. Backing. Docking. Coupling. Doing reverse serpentines. Then taking the big rigs out on the Interstate.

You got what it takes to take on the big rigs? Over 20? Good driving record? In good physical condition? Then fill out the coupon today and let's talk it over. If you're a veteran, great! Ryder Technical Institute is approved for veteran's training.

If you want to climb the big rig ladder, start with the pros at Ryder.

Climb the big rig ladder with Ryder training.

All In a Day's Knight

ART: JIM HANLEY
STORY: JOE MOLLOY

It was Gerard's first time within the palace. Although schooled in the callous dignity befitting a knight, he could not help but marvel at the splendor of the trappings. Tapestries from Persia, threaded with gold and myrtle leaves, draped the walls; marble statues, remnants of the Graecian Golden Age, posed with a vigor that too realistically resembled life.

Gerard was not a man easily moved, but today his heart danced to a beat just slightly below that of actual fear. For today he was to meet the king, who would assign him his final task — the success of which would assure him a seat in the brotherhood of knights. But the outcome could also result in his death.

The king was a large man, white of beard and blue-eyed. He was garbed in the regal purple of the sea snail. Gerard looked up at him upon the dais as the king bellowed in a voice stern, yet gentle:

"You will seek the last skill of a knight on the plain before the Boiling Swamps of Cauldron."

Gerard shuddered an instant before replying, "But I am well trained in the use of the sword. No man can brace himself against a swing of my axe. I am adept at fighting with knife and mace, and in the use of the long bow, I have no equal." The king grew silent for a moment, and Gerard hoped he hadn't overdone his presentation.

"This is all true," the king finally answered. "But there is one talent that cannot be taught, and this you must find yourself."

"Is not the final measure of a knight his strength, your majesty? I have the strength of three men."

"No," replied the king, looking at the knight as he might if he were his own son. "What good is strength alone against ten or even one hundred men?"

"Can it be courage that I must seek?" queried Gerard. "No lion may boast of a heart braver than mine."

"This is true," answered the king, "but what good would courage do you against a knife in the back?"

"Truth then. The alchemists insist that truth is the father of all. No lie has ever left my lips."

"This we all know, my son," replied the king, shewing a patience that earned him more respect than his vast legions. "But truth will not aid you against the unbelievers. Go now, and Godspeed. The Land of Cauldron awaits your coming."

And so it was a heavy heart and confused mind that accompanied Gerard and his steed Lenchinvar to the outlaw regions of Cauldron.

The knight's path took him across a great plain. He marveled at the quiet until a flapping of wings came to him from a distance.

When he saw its cause, he gripped the hilt of his sword. But it was already too late. A living gargoyle careened out of the sun and tackled Gerard, knocking him to the ground.

Gerard had dropped his sword and found himself weaponless as the gargoyle's fangs dug into his throat. Without thinking, Gerard, with a mighty effort, forced the gargoyle away from him as he reached for his knife. Acting instinctively, the knife found its mark, and the contest was over.

Gerard pushed the body from him and mused, "Strength appears to have saved me. Yet the king said strength was not mine to seek."

But his reverie was cut short by a voice behind him, "Strength will not help you against my potions, knight." Gerard turned to see an aged wizard in green robes brandishing a vial of cherry colored liquid.

"Strength is not my only weapon," boasted Gerard as the wizard hurled the vial at his feet. A cloud of crimson smoke enveloped the knight, yet he could discern eldritch forms advancing toward him.

Creatures conceived in a nightmare tore the knife from Gerard's grasp. They clutched at his arms, legs, and throat. He was powerless in their grip and fear began to spill into his mind.

But his training suddenly took over. He shoved the fear into some forgotten corner of his mind and fought the unknown with insurmountable courage. The beasts abruptly vanished and Gerard realized they never had been real. He turned to see the wizard fleeing in the distance and considered, "Courage helped me defeat this evil magician, yet the king said that courage alone was not the key."

Gerard's perplexity increased as he noticed a cloud of dust approaching him from the mountains beyond. A band of wild-looking eastern nomads drew rein before the knight.

"We are looking for a horse thief," explained the [illegible]

"I am not the one you seek," spoke the truthful knight.

Another nomad spoke in whispers loud enough for Gerard to hear. "Let us kill him ... just in case."

"No," bellowed their leader. "I read truth in this man's eyes." And with that, he turned his horse, and continued the search.

Then Gerard began to understand. "It is neither strength, courage, nor truth that makes a knight, but all of these, and the wisdom to know which to use." And so he mounted Lenchinvar and headed west, to claim his rightful seat at the king's table.
